This week in Voyagers Vanessa chose one of her favourite stories - the poor widow who put her pennies in the temple collecting box, giving all that she had to God. We remembered that what matters is not how big or small our gifts or efforts are, or what other people think of them, but that God welcomes all that is given wholeheartedly to him.

Love and prayers,

Christine.
FLOWER OF THE WEEK: NASTURTIUM.

19th in a series.

Text by Peter Surridge.

NASTURTIUMS are among the best vigorous annuals of late summer, producing bright green foliage and fiery flowers to cover the scruffy, dying foliage of early summer flowers, conceal untidy corners and scramble among faded clematis and honeysuckle. They do not require much water or feed though they do demand good light. Plant pot-grown seedlings under the leafy cover of south and west-facing plants, and their bright shoots will quickly break cover and head towards the sun.

The nasturtium originated in South America, though its botanical name, tropaeolum, was taken from the Greek and Latin battlefield words for trophy – a tree trunk festooned by the winners with the losers’ bloodied helmets and shields. The familiar garden flower, Tropaeolum majus, used to be grown up poles hung with netting, showing off its shield-shaped leaves and scarlet flowers – hence the ‘trophy’ connection. ‘Nasturtium’ comes from Pliny’s term for pungent plants – nasus for nose and tortus to twist – and is now officially applied to watercress. Nasturtiums provide similarly crisp, peppery leaves, which add a tang to salads. The seed pods can be pickled when young and taste like capers. The flowers and flower buds are also eaten.

Many varieties of nasturtium are hybrids of Tropaeolum majus. The flowers are scarlet, orange, bronze or yellow and many have spots, blotches, striped or marbled effects. Dwarf forms such as crimson Empress of India and multi-coloured Tom Thumb are good for edging; semi-trailing types like Glorious Gleam are suitable for hanging baskets, while the tall traditional kinds are ideal for a major cover-up. In containers, the plants flower more freely while in the ground foliage tends to dominate. The fine Alaska series such as Whisky and Ice has foliage dotted and marbled with creamy white. A 19th-century variety, Hermine Grashoff, has scarlet-orange double flowers.

Seeds can be sown in pots with protection from March or directly into the ground from May. Self-sown seeds sometimes survive in the ground until spring and produce early flowers. In any situation, nasturtiums can be infested by blackfly which can be controlled by destroying affected leaves but suffer few other problems. Herbalists use nasturtiums in treatments for various infections, skin troubles and baldness and the plant is an ingredient of commercially-produced hair lotion.
THE LEGEND OF ST CHRISTOPHER

St Hildeburgh's windows: 22nd in a series.

Text and photograph by Peter Surridge.

CHRISTOPHER, widely recognised as the patron saint of travellers, is now thought more likely to have been mythical than actual. His date and place of birth are unknown, though he was believed to have been martyred by the Romans in the third century.

There are several legends about him. In one, he was crossing a river when a little boy asked to be carried across. Christopher was tall and strong but when he put the child on his shoulders he found him to be unbelievably heavy and was barely able to complete the crossing. The child said, “No wonder you are exhausted – I am Jesus Christ and I am carrying the weight of the world.” The name Christopher means Christ-bearer. In medieval times, it was thought that anyone who saw an image of St Christopher would be protected for that day. As a result, large pictures of him were painted in churches. In our window, he is depicted carrying the Christ-child and attended by swallows – thought to indicate the fact that the window commemorates the life of an RAF officer. St Christopher’s feast day, formerly July 25, is no longer celebrated. The window was installed in 1944-45 “in memory of Flying Officer Douglas Gordon Bennett, RAF, killed in combat 24.7.44, given by his wife.”
